

GOLFERS WILL MEET FOR AMERICAN TITLE

Nineteenth National Tourney to Be Held on Course at Garden City.

THIRD ONE ON SAME LINKS

Classic Event Shows Unusual Development of Sport in This Country.

Golfers the world over will turn their attention next week to the nineteenth annual tournament for the amateur championship of the United States. The scene will be laid for the third time on the links of the Garden City Golf Club, greatly improved and as good a test of golf as can be found anywhere.

It may be that the history of golf in the United States is not told in the eighteen championships which have already been held, but there can be no question that the development of golf on this continent is shown more in the American classic than in anything else. Although John Reid, the St. Andrews veteran, was largely responsible for the introduction of golf in the United States twenty-five years ago, he has never had the pleasure or honor of winning a national championship. Reid, however, competed in that memorable first tournament held on the links of the St. Andrews Golf Club, where he defeated Charles B. MacDonald, founder of the National Golf Links of America and then representing the Chicago Golf Club, in the final round by 1 up. There were just twenty-eight golfers to tee up in this historic event. There were two byes, with no qualifying round.

It was then that the United States Golf Association was organized for the purpose of exercising national supervision over golf, with the result that on October 1, 2 and 3, 1895, the first official titular tournament was held on the links of the Newport Golf Club in Rhode Island. On that occasion MacDonald achieved the distinction of being the first recognized amateur champion of the United States, defeating C. E. Sands of St. Andrews by 12 up and 11 in the thirty-six hole final round.

The same year championship tournaments were also provided for the women and the professionals, the former at Meadow Brook and the latter at Newport, which marked the first great step in American golf. Since then three phases have been attended to regularly.

The second amateur championship of the United States Golf Association and the third in the nation, held at Shinnecock Hills in 1896, the time being switched from October to July. H. J. Whigham, then of Oswego, but later of the National Links, won the title. MacDonald had been eliminated in the first round. It was at Shinnecock Hills that the idea of a qualifying round was introduced with sixteen to qualify for the main play. The following year, in 1897, at the Chicago Golf Club, where Whigham once more was successful, a year later, however, brought the tournament back to Garden City to be played in match play bracket increased from sixteen to thirty-two. There were 120 entries, and Walter J. Travis, then of Oakland, made his first appearance, having advanced to the semi-final round, where Findlay S. Douglas of Fairfield, later of Nassau, beat the now famous player by the decisive margin of 6 to 2.

Travis made his second attempt at the national title at Onwentsla in 1899, and once more it was Findlay Douglas who proved the stumbling block. Douglas won 2 up and 1 in the final round, but in the semi-final round was beaten by H. M. Harriman of Meadow Brook by 4 up and 5 to play, in turn beat Douglas, 3 and 2.

It was in 1900 that Garden City was the scene of the tournament for the first time, and on that occasion Walter J. Travis became the national champion. He secured, according to the previous defeats at the hands of Findlay Douglas by beating the latter 2 up in the decisive test. Travis proved himself the finished golfer that he still is, and in the previous year at Atlantic City, this time disposing of the aspirations of Walter E. Egan, one of the Western stars.

Conditions were changed for the tournament held at Garden City in 1902, for the qualifying round was at eighteen holes and sixty-four players became eligible for match play. It marked the advent of Eben M. Byers of Albany in the amateur championship, and the first time a final round against Louis N. James of Glen View, the latter winning the championship by 4 up and 2 to play. The year following with 140 entries at Nassau, the British system of having everything at match play, which system was quickly abandoned. It was here that Jerome D. Travers made his debut as a competitor for the title, and in the previous year he had won the title against P. H. Jennings of St. Andrews, Jennings winning by 4 up and 2 to play.

There were many well known players in this tournament twenty years ago, and it seemed to mark the beginning of the invasion by the younger generation. Here were names of men who afterward became champions. The field included, among others, Douglas, whose light was dimmed by G. A. Ormiston in the second round; Archie Reid of St. Andrews, Howard Perrin of Philadelphia, Fredrick H. Thomson of Stockbridge, Howard Whitney of Nassau, W. C. Fownes, Jr., of Oakland, George T. Brock of Deal, the Rhett brothers of the Philadelphia Cricket Club, Daniel Chauncey of Dyker Meadow, Chas. Emmet of Garden City, Max Behr of Morris County, T. D. Hooper of Nassau and C. B. Cory of Wollaston. The upshot of the whole thing was that Travis forced Byers to be content as runnerup for the second time.

Another plan was tried when the amateur championship was held at Baltiroad in 1904, for it was there that the total of fifty-four holes in a qualifying round counted. It was there too that Travis, three times winner of the title, met his Waterloo in the second round at the hands of G. A. Ormiston. It also marked the advent of Frederick Herreshoff of Elwyn, who developed a new champion in the person of H. Chandler Egan of Exmoor, who defeated Herreshoff in the decisive test by 5 up and 6 to play. In 1905 at Chicago Egan was once again a winner, defeating D. E. Sawyer of Wheaton in the final round. Here the conditions were brought back to the thirty-six holes testing circuit, with thirty-two to qualify for match play.

Twice runnerup, Eben M. Byers won his spurs at Englewood the year following, defeating G. S. Lyon of Toronto in the final round by 2 up, and it was in 1907 at Chicago Egan was again a winner, defeating D. E. Sawyer of Wheaton in the final round. Here the conditions were brought back to the thirty-six holes testing circuit, with thirty-two to qualify for match play.

"WHY, THAT'S NOTHING GREAT. I CAN DO IT BETTER MYSELF"

Experts at sheepdog trials; competitors watching the performance of their rivals. Jealousy, contempt, anxiety and disapproval are written on their faces. All are on leash, but they have poked their noses under the tent and are peeping out and having a look for themselves to see whether everybody is doing his duty.

At the final, 8 and 7, Robert A. Gardner at Wheaton and W. C. Fownes, Jr., at Brookline were the next two titleholders, with the memorable visit of Harold Hilton and his lucky victory at Apawamis over Herreshoff in 1911 still fresh in the minds of the American golfing public. Travers's victory over Charles Evans, Jr., at Wheaton last year needs no review, and there are many who believe that "Jerry" will win his fourth championship at Garden City this week. The record follows:

Year	Place	Winner	Runnerup
1895	Newport	C. B. MacDonald	C. E. Sands

GATES BEREFT OF HIS CROWN.

Victor Hockmeyer Annexes Tennis Honors at Maplewood.

MAPLEWOOD, N. H., Aug. 30.—W. B. Gates of Brooklyn lost his tennis title here today to Victor Hockmeyer of Lowell. The set scores were 2-6, 6-2, 6-2, 6-2.

In the next sets the youthful challenger, coming out the victor by reversing the score, steadier play marked this set and several long rallies resulted after the wind died down. It was the turning point in Hockmeyer's game and he showed unsteadiness as a result. Hockmeyer was affected more so than Gates and the initial set went to the latter, 6-2.
